A MIDSUMMER TRIP TO THE WEST INDIES (1). BY LAFCADIO HEARN.

A LONG, narrow, graceful steel steamer, with two masts and an orange-yellow chimney, taking on cargo at Pier 49 East River. Through her yawning hatchways a mountainous piling up of barrels is visible below; there is much rumbling and rattling of steam-winch, creaking of derrick booms, groaning of pulleys, as the freight is being lowered in. A breezeless July morning, and a dead heat: 92° already.

The saloon deck gives one suggestion of past and of coming voyages. Under the white awnings long lounge-chairs sprawl here and there, each with an occupant, smoking in silence, or dozing with head drooping to one side. A young man, awaking as I pass to my cabin, turns upon me a pair of immense black eyes – creole eyes. Evidently a West Indian.

AT THE MARKET OF THE DEAD.

IT is just past five o'clock in the afternoon. Through the open door of my little study the rising breeze of evening is beginning to disturb the papers on my desk, and the white fire of the Japanese sun is taking that pale amber tone which tells that the heat of the day is over. There is not a cloud in the blue, – not even one of those beautiful white filamentary things, like ghosts of silken floss, which usually swim in this most ethereal of earthly skies even in the driest weather.

A sudden shadow at the door. Akira, the young Buddhist student, stands at the threshold slipping his white feet out of his sandal-thongs preparatory to entering, and smiling like the god Jizo.

"Ah! komban, Akira."

"To-night," says Akira, seating himself upon the floor in the posture of Buddha upon the Lotos, "the Bon-ichi will be held. Perhaps you would like to see it?"
